HANSOM HALL

453m² / 4900ft²

Our largest event space, once the prestigious location where the Hanson Cabs originally dropped off wealthy passengers is both unique and memorable.

Occupying the former cobbled driveway where hansom cabs once deposited their well-heeled passengers, Hansom Hall combines Victorian splendour with contemporary style. Flanked on either side by the window bays of the original station and hotel walls, and vaulted by its high glazed roof and Barlow Blue girders, the space is as dramatic by day as it is by night.

THE BILLIARD

A warm and intimate retreat, the The Billiard accommodates up to 35 guests. With subtle charm and relaxed refinement, it is ideal for close-knit receptions or focused meetings where meaningful connections unfold.

“There are few more cheerful sights, when the evenings are long and the weather dull, than a handsome, well-lighted billiard room...” — Jr, 1889.

When the Midland Grand first opened, billiards was a popular pastime among the upper classes. The hotel featured a dedicated billiard room where gentlemen could play while their partners relaxed in the Ladies’ Smoking Room. A staff member was assigned solely to keep score, earning ten pence a week plus tips.

Now, The Billiard serves as a stylish meeting or dining space for 10–12 guests, retaining its historic charm.

THE EXCHANGE

69m² / 743ft²

The Exchange is a refined, intimate setting for thoughtful conversation and strategic gatherings. Seating up to 30 guests, it blends quiet elegance with a welcoming atmosphere that encourages ideas to flow and connections to deepen.

Top hotels today are expected to make available the latest in communication technology to their guests – and it was no different when the Midland Grand was open.

Alexander Graham Bell's historic first transmission of clear speech by telephone was made in 1876, just three years after the hotel opened. The Exchange is where the hotel's telephone auto exchange was installed as soon as the technology gained widespread use.

THE QUARTERS

Under soaring beams and captivating artwork, The Quarters offers distinctive character. Seating up to 24 guests, it is ideal for board meetings or presentations seeking a memorable, design-led setting.

The Midland Grand employed a small army of staff to carry out basic functions in guest rooms such as stoking the fireplaces, fetching and removing water for washing, and emptying chamber pots. They were dedicated to the task of meeting their guests' needs; if they failed there was always a queue of others eager to fill their shoes.

The hotel needed many of them to remain on hand through the night, so there was accommodation for staff on the top floor, and this room, The Quarters, which was originally separated into four small sleeping compartments and heated by a single fireplace.

ROYAL SUITE LOUNGE

Once a grand ballroom, the Royal Suite Lounge now hosts intimate, creative gatherings of up to 22 guests. Its historic beauty and refined atmosphere inspire connection, celebration, and truly special moments.

Once the beating heart of Victorian high society, the Royal Suite Lounge began its life as the grand ballroom of the Midland Grand Hotel in 1873. In an era when refinement defined status, the room echoed with the music of string quartets and the laughter of London's most distinguished guests.

The room featured decorative plasterwork, tall windows, and a grand fireplace that warmed the space during glittering winter galas. Stories from the time suggest that Queen Victoria's courtiers may have gathered here—and legend has it that a young Winston Churchill once attended a railway banquet as a child.

In 2011, following a meticulous restoration, the ballroom was reborn as the Royal Suite Lounge, a name that pays homage to its regal past. Today, it hosts intimate and creative gatherings of up to 22 guests, and many of the original architectural features remain; a nod to the monarchy's enduring connection to this storied venue.
